

Peace Peninsula

When you stand under the second Gazebo and look across the lake, you'll notice that the water level remains the same. That is thanks to the Longhorn Dam. Before 1960, this area was a vast gravel-mining complex. And the round lagoon you see behind the peninsula was once a quarry!

This very peninsula also served as a crossing point for the low areas of the Colorado River. At the end of the peninsula, you will see a majestic Cypress tree standing proudly. If you shift your view to the opposite bank (Northwest), you'll spot a low point resembling a boat ramp. It raises the question of whether it was an anchor point for ferries that crossed the river in the 1850s.
